cians and priests make their decisions for them.

ON THE ABSTINENT '80s: If people don't want to drink anymore that's well and fine, but they shouldn't do it out of fashion—and it is very much a fashion in America right now. It's just another trend for people to follow: the sheep-like mentality running rampant in a new way.

ON POP CULTURE: Pop culture gives people false expectations of life, covers up the wrongs of society and lulls people into a false sense of security. A Madonna record will not save you from anything. As long as you're aware of that then go ahead and enjoy it.

ON IDOL WORSHIP: Musicians have been elevated to an exalted place in society because they obviously fill a neurotic need. Perhaps it's a symptom of the religious crisis of the Western world, but something tells me it all comes down to financial clout.

There's quite a bit of money being spent to convince people that they need to go out and purchase certain products. It's very hard to combat the constant drilling they subject us to, and the music business can sell literally anything.

they decide to get behind and sell. People like Madonna and Michael Jackson have the wheels of the industry behind them so it would be hard for them not to be successful with that kind of muscle behind them.

Jackson's success is, of course, partly attributable to the fact that he's an interesting person who wins on many levels, and his eccentricity is intriguing. I've no interest in Madonna whatsoever—that one I can't explain.

ON GREED: Most people are motivated by greed. I am one of the few who are not, although there are a few others. Talking Heads seem to have other things on their minds than the pursuit of the dollar. David Byrne is a shrewd businessman, but why shouldn't he be? That doesn't diminish the fact that he makes an effort to do more than just glorify a persona.

ON JOHN'S ROTTEN IMAGE: The most widely held misconception about me is that I'm nasty. That image has been a protective device for me for years, but it can't work forever. It's getting tedious both for me and the viewer, and has become a form of play acting. I can be as jovial as the next guy.

ON APOCALYPSE NOW: People have become more aware of the crisis with the ozone layer and things like that, but it might just be too late. I don't think anybody will be able to stop corporate greed and the oil spill in Alaska proves that.

Who benefited from that disaster? The oil companies. They've raised the price on everything, including current stocks since their little mishap up north, and nobody seems eager to punish them. There will be a few small fines and promises of a clean-up campaign and that will be it.

Everybody—including myself—seems to be going on about the end of the world, but I don't see that as a bad thing. Good riddance to the bad rubbish known as the human race. So, if we've got to go we should go in style. Lets not be morbid about it.

ON AN OBSOLETE DREAM: I've given up trying to change the world. It's too grandiose a task and I'm really not capable of such a thing. No one individual is. □
